

This passage is about a series of events which led to a disaster; sticky fingers. As stated by Murphy's ~~laws~~ that 'if anything can go wrong, it will.' For example, people are worried about possibly falling down on a snowy day, but on high probability they will finally fall to the ground even when trying their best. To delay Murphy's laws from happening in our everyday life and reducing its bad effects, people need to do things according to certain procedures. For instance, in this story, there is a chain of events such as marking tarts, picking up telephone, signing a registered letter, etc. The key event here is the processes of making tarts which is spoiled by two other events. Of course, one can refuse to be interrupted; but to be realistic, people should be able to handle unexpected things or do multi-tasks by handling things in a proper way. I think if people can follow a good procedure when stopping and then resuming a process, they should be able to prevent thing to go wrong by these unexpected disturbances.
