This passage is about a famous clock, 'Big Ben' in London. ^{the} Clock has been a device to measure time for centuries. The ^{evolution} of clocks have been from ^{mechanical} mechanical ^{one} to electronic and digital devices. However, big clocks in public places such as clock towers in the center of cities and railway stations are still used to tell those passing-by the present time. ~~the~~ Clock is a great communicator between time and people because it connects us with ^{the} history of ~~past~~. Moreover, it ~~also~~ informs us immediately our present time at our homes and at workplaces. ^{is} It also a great tool to help people to better plan for their future ^{tasks}.

People who ~~are~~ ^{care} much ^{care} about time are more industrious and they are the groups enjoying a high level of civilization, because they are able to better control their ^{pace} of work and life. ~~First~~ The requirements to know ^{too many things} the exact time reflect one's increasing paces of life and the pressure of ^{their} ~~urgency~~. ^{do creating} ~~creates~~ ^{creates} For example, ^{the} People of pre-industrial time ^{care} were less ^{care} about time for the sunshine and sunset are enough to indicate passing of a day due to their slow ^{the} paces of life and inefficient agricultural ^{activities}. ^{care more} ~~Later~~ with the development of our societies, the concept of time has changed a lot, people ^{are} ~~are~~ more ^{care} care about their own time and respect others ~~ones~~ because ~~time will~~ ^{never come back again} just as in saying 'time is money.' As no one want to interrupt or to be interrupted ^{each other's} of their busy schedules, making appointment is ~~becoming~~ ^{is} a social convention in a civilized world. For example, people are no longer knocking others' doors to have a talk when they pass by the house of a friend. ^{at} ^{casual}
